LATONIA SPRINGS

by Dr. Joseph Gastright

In the summer of 1829, Ralph Letton told his contractor to hurry the work on the hotel at Latonia Springs. Letton had families at Cincinnati waiting to occupy the rooms and begin to take the waters. Letton was proprietor of the Western Museum in Cincinnati. He had purchased the land on the 4th of July from William Curry who had inherited rights to the parcel of land on his father William's death in 1811.

However, the division of the family's 425 acres was not completed until 6 April 1826. The land was part of a 600 acre parcel made to Joseph Davis in 1785.

Hydrotherapy or "taking the waters" was a widely prescribed medical treatment in 1829. Daniel Drake, Cincinnati's most respected physician, had published a review of Kentucky's mineral water spas in 1828. He described the medical benefits of the springs, but warned that the gambling, and profligate living at some springs were liable to be more dangerous than was beneficial. He mentioned a newly discovered spring, "only four miles from Cincinnati", which was located in a healthy place and which "had attracted considerable attention".

On 30 July 1832, Ralph Letton sold his 57 acres with the hotel to Elisha Morgan for $8,000.00. Morgan, who realized the importance of high quality appurtenances, constructed a 50 room hotel, three stories high with 100 foot piazzas running the full length of the building. In back, he constructed a "large and splendid ballroom.... for the person whose mind is tinged with romance". In 1833, the dreaded Cholera epidemic made the spas of Kentucky financial as well as social successes.

Rich Southerners fled the heat, yellow fever, malaria, and worst of all the cholera, for the dozens of Kentucky spas. The spas north of the Mason Dixon line could not accept the required domestic slave, and Kentucky blossomed as the social center of the South. Trading horses, political opinions, and marriageable daughters were the significant business at the Latonia Springs, with a side trip to Cincinnati to buy some manufactured goods.

The Latonia Springs were probably named after the goddess Leto, or in her Roman guise, Latona. She was the mother of Apollo and Diana, and in Greek mythology, she was tied to a famous incident involving water, "Latona and the Rustics". In the early 1840's, Doctor Stephen Mosher, an Eastern physician, purchased the springs from Morgan's heirs. The springs thrived in the period prior to the Civil War under Mosher's direction. In 1866, the springs were sold to Messrs. Walker and Gibson of the Gibson House in Cincinnati, who set up daily omnibus transportation to the springs.

For a time, Latonia Springs thrived without the southern trade, but during the 1870's the old magic waned, and the owners installed "amusement devices" to attract business. A murder near the springs in 1879, roused the memory that the site was "at one time, one of the most popular summer resorts in the state" but also the reality of "a delapidated wreck of its former prosperity".

Frank Northcutt, a local resident, attempted a revival of the springs in 1880. In 1882, the Latonia Agricultural Association developed a fairgrounds in the Milldale section of South Covington. The fairgrounds, named after the springs, developed into a nationally famous race track. In 1893, a small six block section in the middle of Milldale incorporated as the sixth class city of Latonia. Latonia began to annex the surrounding unincorporated sections of Milldale, and in 1899 became a fifth class city.

The Latonia Springs did not thrive and in 1891, Frank Wolftang leased the acreage to two former Cincinnati residents as the site of a dairy farm. Herman Summe and August Ratterman later purchased the land and used the spring water to cool their product. Sometime about 1910, the springs ceased to flow and Summe and Ratterman built a modern milk processing plant on 20th Street in Covington. For many years a picnic ground and later a tavern survived on the site of the old Latonia Springs Hotel at the corner of Highland Pike and the 3-L Highway.

Mud Roads

A good text for a road speech in the Legislature:

"The roads are not passable, Not even jackassable; And all who would travel 'em, Must turn out and gravel 'em."
